Working the farm again

after “legendary” surgery

Last fall, Jude Cunningham’s daily chores ended abruptly when he was seriously injured on the family farm.

“What the doctor did was next level, legendary.” —Jude’s Father

The 13-year-old Paris youth suffered two broken bones above his right wrist when he was thrown from the calf he was riding. He was rushed to the Horizon Health emergency room and taken into surgery.

Dr. Harish Kempegowda, orthopedic surgeon at Horizon Health, repaired Jude’s broken bones during a complex and lengthy procedure.

Due to the severity of his injury, Jude’s recovery took four months. He is now back to his passion of fishing and weaning calves on the Paris farm.

Early history of Clark County

It is generally accepted that Thomas Handy and his sons John and Stephen were the first permanent white settlers of Clark County. They came from Post St. Vincent near Vincennes to Union Prairie (York) in the spring of 1814. Erecting shelter and cultivating enough land to support themselves, the settlement began.

As Indian hostilities were still frequent in the area, the Handys erected what became known as Fort Handy, ½ mile south of present-day West Union. Fort Handy consisted of two to three cabins with a bullet-proof palisade surrounding and loop holes for firing out of the stockade.

Settlers came rapidly after this time. York Village was founded in 1817 and the first flat boat left for New Orleans during this period. In 1818, John Wise operated the first merchant business at York. These early settlers were governed as part of the Illinois territory from the capitol at Kaskaskia and locally as part of Crawford County, formed in 1816.

The second community to be settled in present day Clark County was at Darwin, just a few miles north of York. An Irishman from Kentucky named John McClure came in 1816 by covered wagon. He built a cabin, dug a well and entered a half section at the present location of Darwin.

The last of the historically - significant settlements was created near Stirling and named Aurora. By the time of statehood in 1818, the required number of 350 people to establish a county resided in northern Crawford County. Thus the process began.

Clark County was named for General George Rogers Clark, gallant hero of the Revolution and liberator at Kaskaskia and Vincennes. The county at formation embraced a huge geographic territory running west from the Wabash River at York nearly to Vandalia and north to the present - day Wisconsin state line. Clark embraced all or part of 34 present counties, including Chicago and Cook County.

The act made Clark the second county formed in the new state and the 17th county altogether. The first election held in the county resulted in Joseph Shaw, John Chenowith and Samuel Ashmore being elected county commissioners and on June 7, 1819 they appointed William B. Archer as Clerk and William Lockard as Treasurer. Thus the fledgling county had its first official elected government.

The Establish Act designated the original appointed commissioners to select a county seat. Thus 202 acres were entered at the district land office in Vincennes for development into a county seat to be known as Aurora.

While no courthouse was built, a log building 12' x 14' was used for county business purposes. The county commissioners did build a two story 12' x

The estray law of the day (for loose animals) required the construction of an estray pen. At that time, there were no fence laws and each person was responsible for their animals. Those that "strayed" became the property of the county government.

The estray pen was constructed by Colonel Archer for the County - 36 feet square with 6 feet high white walnut posts 8" square, sunk 3 feet into the ground.

The final County project was the erection of a public whipping post. It was a tree, stripped of bark, about not adequate. It soon became apparent that the county seat site needed to be moved about 2 miles south on the river to a place known as McClure's Bluff. Consequently, in January 1823, the legislature at Vandalia ordered the re-location to the site that would become known as Darwin.

In August 1823, 64 lots were offered for sale in the new county seat town. Darwin quickly grew, becoming the new seat of government, a thriving river port and commercial trading center. For five years, Darwin lots were worth more than those in Chicago. Her commercial appeal rivaling Terre Haute.

Clark County's first dedicated courthouse was erected at Darwin. The 25 foot long building of hewn oak logs with a lap shingle roof was finally occupied in 1827. In January 1823, the commissioners contracted for a new jail at a cost of $490.

During this period of time "flat boat" commerce on the Wabash River became one of the chief economic drivers of the Wabash Valley. The abundant farm products of the day found the best cash market in far away New Orleans.

Corn, wheat, pork, whiskey and hoop-poles went down river with great regularity. Until the advent of the steam powered paddle wheelers, the flat boat business was thriving. Many tales of flat boat traffic down the Wabash, Ohio and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans and the ensuing trips overland back to Clark County with all of one's profits are well-known. The quickest trips by keelboat from Darwin were 2-3 weeks, but most took a couple of months.

The very first settlers in Clark County were subsistence farmers and game hunters and fishers. The Wabash and adjoining lands were generous in their support of the early families.

It soon became apparent that some cash income would be necessary to make quality-of-life improvements. The trapping and fur business was of diminished value, so agricultural products became the only alternative.

The soil was abundant and productive, but markets were distant and difficult to reach. Vincennes and Terre Haute were the closest trading posts. The good markets were much farther away, and the best was at New Or-

The construction of flat or keel boats and shipping of local farm products began very early on. The first boats leaving Clark County were probably going out in 1818. By then, flat boat and barge traffic was considerable with 1500 flat boats and 500 barges floated down river to New Orleans from all over the Mississippi watershed.

Corn, wheat, pork, whiskey, barrel staves and hoop-poles were surplus commodities produced in the Wabash Valley with good demand in the far-away New Orleans.

Early flat boats were logs lashed together with a crude wooden rudder for steering and a type of lean-to or box for shelter. As experience was gained in building boats and lessons learned from those who piloted them, they became much better built and more sophisticated.

The boats were constructed on the river bank by groups of farmers whose produce would be shipped. The demand for boats became so great that some devoted all their time to boat building, charging up to a dollar per linear foot. Poplar and sycamore were abundant and easy to work with. Most boats were 15 to 20 feet wide and varying lengths, depending on the cargo and crew. Later boats had sides 4-5 feet high, with a roof over the center. Many boats had two steering oars in the rear. Some boats were manned by the farmers whose produce was being transported.

Some larger boats had hired crews. Navigators were paid $50-70 per trip to New Orleans and crews around $530. The boats were dismantled at New Orleans and the lumber sold, thus recouping some cost of boat construction.

The quickest trip to New Orleans from Darwin was done in 14 days and one in 16 days, benefiting from perfect current and weather conditions. Most boats left Darwin and York during the spring flood, when the water was "up". Risks from snags and trees and sandbars were high. In later years, collision with steamboats became a major danger. River traffic attained vast proportions with 50-75 boats passing down river during the height of the season. This activity continued with unabated vigor until 1861 and the beginning of the Civil War.

The trip to New Orleans was only half the effort. Marketing the produce, dismantling the boat, selling the lumber and collecting the money in a manner that one could return home with it were challenges.

On one occasion, Thomas Handy walked back from New Orleans. Others bought a horse and rode home. The trips home were often more perilous than the river trip south. Flush with cash and money, many a boater succumbed to thieves, gamblers and the many vices of New Orleans, Natchez and the river. It is recorded that John Richardson, Ambrose Pease, John Hollenbeck and Isaac Moore, all of the York community, made numerous trips down river and returned home with the proceeds.

One story is told of a Darwin farmer who took a load of wood to New Orleans. Having collected for the wood, he got in a fight, struck his adversary and killed him. He was hung for murder in New Orleans, leaving his impoverished grieving family in Illinois.

York historians remind us that men like Stephen Pritchard became master river men. Pritchard made 22 flat boat trips from Clark County to New Orley and Hogue they filled boats with crops and lumber products sending them down river to New Orleans. The flat-boat revenue served as the source of improvements in early Clark County.

Just as Abraham Lincoln recalled his riverboat experiences, numerous Clark County pioneers became story tellers of this historic era that shaped early Clark County history.

Although Aurora Bend lasted only a few years, a distillery was erected there which produced two barrels a day. Whiskey, along with hides from a tannery, was cargo on the very first flat boats leaving Clark County.

John Richardson erected a large brick distillery in York. Reasoning that it was easier to ship whiskey down river than corn, he made considerable money converting Clark County corn and flat boating it to New Orleans as whiskey.

Samuel Prevo came to Clark County in 1817, settling west of York. With other names familiar here today like Hilbert, Chenoweth, Marvin, Lind-
